For these and similar reasons the adoption of this method may result in a considerable saving in the expense of constructing long outfall sewers, pumping plants, etc., which should be credited to it when making comparative estimates of cost. The operating expenses will certainly be less than for any of the artificial processes, and will probably not be greater than for land treatment. In conclusion, it may be stated that the experience of the last four or five years seems to indicate that the main problems in the disposal of sewage have been solved; and that further progress will be in the direction of improvements in the methods of applying the principles, and in the details of operation. Whether the preliminary liquefaction, which is the distinguishing feature of these new bacterial methods, is essentially anaerobic or not is not certain, in view of the action which takes place in the coarse bed of the Dibdin system. In any case preliminary treatment in an open or closed septic tank seems advisable. A system of this kind is especially adapted for isolated plants such as for large country houses, hospitals, schools, etc., being compact in arrangement, and, when covered, free from nuisance, while at the same time protected from the effects of cold. The degree of purification effected by such methods has been already referred to, and the effluents have been shown to be entirely satisfactory, both from the point of view of their chemical purity,...
